Sleeping, his only escape from it all when hes dreaming, he gets a chance to escape from the world and leave it behind he doesn't know what is real, but he knows he'd rather not deal he doesn't want to wake up to the world running, she wants to run across the grass instead she's lying, in a hospital bed hooked up to gas, and tubes, and lights she doesn't even know she's alive except her mother's praying by her side the coma has her locked into a hole she doesn't even know what is real, except, what they, tell her, to feel what are you looking at? Sometimes the things behind us help remind us of that

Somewhere, between the subconscious and the sublime familiar faces meet for a moment displaced in time when one of them talks: he says he wants to give up, 'cause his daughter had been taken across he doesn't think, he can make it on his own when the other face tries to respond she sees the face, is already gone...
