You're tired enough, my greatest Lord You see no future, only a dreadful end You're arms are too weak to hold your sword The destinies of nations depend on you no more.

You're sitting on the mighty throne And looking to the past You think about right and wrong Your time is running fast

Visions going through your mind You see the kingdom fall By suffering and pain of mankind You have made your final choice

You hear the gentle voice of love But you won't abandon to your passions anymore Her name is rising from your heart But will be dead with you and sink into oblivion forever You see your brother's eyes Remember how together you ran and hunted in the forest But now you realize That he's your enemy. And was it really worth this?

You try to protect your people from the war But the cost of this is their slavery Now you're asking yourself: "What for?" For what is this humiliation? Why this mortification?
