The heat has a taste. It taste like a flame. You drink up the flame and it burns your flesh away. And in a city of clouds, your just a face in the crowd, but you take up your place and you throw yourself away, everyday of your life.

Well, take a breath and take a seat, take your medicine. Close your eyes and cauterise the wound your opening.

While all these lives that make no sense, all the love we cry in our defense. And all of us go down slow, then we rise again. Just like a tide out at sea, we lower and rise again. And the days go by and the nights all feel the same. And the beast in your eyes slowly becomes tame. Someday you will change.

This world is gone, and drug us along and nothings the same and it will never be again. It's never gonna be the same.

And all these lives that make no sense, all the love we cry in our defense. All of us go down slow, then we rise again. Just like a tide out at sea we lower and rise again. I said the days go by and the nights all feel the same, and the beast in your eyes slowly becomes tame and dim. Someday never comes.
