Come into my room, let the space consume you, cause the walls were dying to look at something new. Let me breath you in, soft clouds exacting, night sky protracting, a luminouse invite. Though the moon is old and dying, twilight just keeps inciting, and the planets all deciding where we'll fall into.

But love is it enough to destroy all the walls that keep on building up? I just want to stay with you untill the moon is overthrown. That's the part of love I've always known.

We'll stay inside my where the cracks are crawling, and the signs a-scrawling evasive and unkind. But you pull me near and undress my warm tears. You distill my sadness and plainly understand. Though the moon is old and ageing, twilight resuscitating and the planets still debating where we'll fall into.

But love is it enough to destroy all the walls that keep on building up? I just want to stay with you untill the moon is overthrown. That's the part of love I've always known.

Though the sky is cloudy we're still seen. The drifting bodies carried from the stream. The scaly fishes sorling through the dead abandoned sea. This universe unveils its mystery.

Well now I'm in your room and I hear my calling, though my heart is stalling. It's time to say goodbye. So through the dark I'll tread, 'till I find my strong bed, to the light that's been bled through heavy trees unknown. Now the moon is dissapating, twilight disintegrating, all the sunlight clearly stating where we'll fall into. A path to follow through.

But love is it enough to destroy all the walls that keep on building up? I just want to stay with you untill the moon is overthrown. That's the part of love I've always known. That's the part of love I've always known. Show me a part of love I've never known. That's the part of love I've never known
