On a trampoline these kids,
Would talk about their lives.
Two lovers with an educated view on future lies.
The plans they made were fair,
No one could change their minds.
These lovers with an educated view on future lies.

See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running.

On a trampoline these kids,
Would kiss and talk all night.
Too young to know their future dreams would turn to future lies.
Talk of marriage was common place,
For who could break their ties.
These lovers with an educated view on future lies.

See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running.
See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running.

(See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running.)

In the grass these kids would lay,
Just the sky watching them play.
Two lovers with an educated view on future days.
But we know this stories wrong,
These two kids they fell away.
These lovers with an educated view on future days.

See them running, see them running.

See them running, see them running.
See them running, see them running.
See them running, see them running.

See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running now.
See them running, see them running.

See them running, see them running.
See them running, see them running.
See them running, see them running.
See them running, see them running.

(See them running, see them running.
See them running, see them running.
See them running, see them running.
See them running, see them running now.)
