we were able-minded once but guilt doesn't open doors so we toss our fits of charm and I muscle my way into a desperate situation too many times to count and some day we will gather up for an hour or two and shake our hands until then, I resign my post as a daydream you can't hide but at least I cut myself off from the words left on the table for all to see this is where I left the group there were trees without a whisper and the sound was deafening this is how I spend my time with a book and no disasters and we fail each time we meet and some day when the pen decides that we're old enough I hope you ask again and how far is pretty far? well it's pretty far too far for you but at least I'm half-way healthy though I'm still spineless as a scenester at least I've got some friends who prop me up at night for dinner at least I found the love scene in the film about my parents they cradle their discussions like they're afraid to drop their children at least my eyes were closed when you said this world is just too spacious at least I lost a love when I was barely out of context at least I saved your seat once until you threw up all your homework the best part wasn't ruined I just held onto it for safety at least my dreams aren't wrapped up in that pension you've been saving at least I pray at night to something other than the ceiling oh oh oh
