Men with both roots and wings they tie us down and ask us to leave they are teachings unheard, they are bodies on smoke

at a singular voice we moan our teachings mislead, our teachings like smoke we sleep between the storm that was and the storm which has to come

We've learnt to learn everywhere and the very own nature has taught us to wait difference does sound like sin, equality reliefs and that fame rhymes with hate yet everything is fair on the intervals of your death misguided demons or forthcoming heroes each one with an important name nothing else than an important name.

at a certain time we are one our little tricks, our innocence stubborn

Men with just little wings, men with just little minds Men with just little eyes, men with just little deeds sleeping between the storm that was and the wind which fails to come (and finally) blow us away.
