I've seen their frozen lives,
I know that I've been there before and something tells
me that I'm still alive.
And those were the days the rains came,
they left me looking down from above,
as I watched it all die.
Some things never change, you came running,
screaming that you buried it for good.
Under gods of sullen suns you live in pain,
as keeper of this frozen divide of sanguine skies.
One by one at shoulders length we taste the pain.
I stand before one million souls in vein, and I am falling down.
Some things never change, you came running,
screaming that you buried it for good.
I've seen their frozen lives,
I know that I've been there before and something tells
me that I'm still alive.
And those were the days the rains came,
they left me looking down from above,
as I watched it all die.
Some things never change,
you came running,
screaming that you buried it for good.
