We've been on this road that's buried by two feet of snow since dawn, since dawn We've stopped a dozen times so far.
I haven't seen a single car for hours, for hours save the ones in unmarked roadside resting places, waiting there.

We've many miles yet to go, through every inch of fallen snow,
to the last town in Ontario.
But we're still stuck somewhere outside of Dresden.

Each tree marks one more meter gained,
but I'm not sure the way this time, this time.
Through glasses I no longer strain to read the names of towns, of towns I had forgotten years ago.
Somehow this province has grown strange to me, as if the past we shared those years ago was just a dream.

We've many miles yet to go,
through every inch of fallen snow,
to the last town in Ontario.
But we're still stuck somewhere
outside of Dresden.

But maybe it's just that we are together, baby, which propels us towards forever...
