The subway station's closed again Sleeps beneath its veil of rain My footprints broken trail behind Steals the night lights from my mind

The dark deserted streets then clear Today has lived and died in here So I leave the chapel gloom To find the shelter of my tiny room

But it's alright while the lights
Of the city shine so bright
It's all right 'til the last winding train
Fades from sight

Then alone in my room
I must stay to lose or win
While these wild bedsitter images
Come back to hem me in

The paneled patterns on the door Chase shivering shadows to the floor Upon the pillow worn and thin The memories of hopes begin

The carpet with its flowers and shredding Spires a foot before my bed The crack that won't return again Advancing through my broken window pane

But it's alright while the lights
Of the city shine so bright
It's all right 'til the last winding train
Fades from sight

Then alone in my room
I must stay to lose or win
While these wild bedsitter images
Come back to hem me in

The friends I've left back home all write With laughing words that warm my sight

Saying, "Tell us, how's the city life?" I reply and say just fine

And so you see, I can't go back
'Til I either win or crack
I'm standing in a one way street
The stage is set, the story incomplete

But it's alright while the lights
Of the city shine so bright
It's all right 'til the last winding train
Fades from sight

Then alone in my room I must stay to lose or win While these wild bedsitter images Come back to hem me in
