(alexander)

luther's windows are littered with nothing a crystal, a picture, a dead potted sage a dusty white curtain, the nose prints of a dog a shot glass collection from his truck driving days luther's bedroom is as hot as an oven with air that's as stale as old forgotten bread in a cage on the dresser there's a parrot that talks but her name over and over is all that it says turn your back to the sun

you see only shadows

look beneath the stars

you see only night

like a homesick sailor

luther's standing in the window watching the world floating by him tonight luther's hands once held a chain with keys to a home and a blue chevrolet now he lives with his mother, steals all her liquor and chain smokes and stares at the ceiling for days

like a homesick sailor
luther's standing in the window
luther's sitting by himself on the sofa with his head bowed down but his eyes are open wide having a one man revival with an electronic bible listening to the parade going by and the bass drum is pounding, the trumpets are bleating and he's reading a verse from st. john a trickle of light seeps through the blind luther pulls down the shade until he makes up his mind well, turn your back to the sun
you see only shadows
like a homesick sailor
it's floating by him tonight
