This coffin isn't big enough for me,
Silk, satin and lace surrounding three,
I hate being dressed up they've got me looking fucked up,
I want out and no ones stopping me.

My finger nails have grown strong enough inch long, sharp, ripping through this stuff Wood shavings falling in my face, who could stand the smell of this place,
how much more can I bear, I've broken through the last layer.

Arise from the dead, awoken from the stench, Bodys that are decomposing, thousands of them decayed and bloating, the reek of them magnifies by how old and when they died,
The smell of these corps' decomposing gags me odors of theme corroding, I must get away from this peutred stench until then I will not rest.

The soil pours in at a steady rate,
Falls on me and I push t all away,
My bed is getting filled up, my body starts to move up, through the hole in the lid that I have ripped away.

The weight of the dirt falls on me it's broken every bone in my body, Kicking fractured arms and legs about, won't be much longer until I'm out, I'm getting close, I'm gaining my site, poke my fingers through to the day light.

The deceased - Sense of smell Detects rot - and awakens this lifeless shell
Now I claw - from hallowed ground
To this reeking stench - I'm no longer bound
