Pity the fate of a poor Irish stranger,
 That wanders so far from his home,
 That sighs for protection from want, woe, and danger,
 That knows not from which way for to roam.
 Yet I'll never return to Hibernia's green bowers,
 For tyranny tramples the sweetest of flowers,
 That once gave me comfort in loneliest hours
 Now they are gone I shall ne'er see them more.
 With wonder I gazed on yon lofty building,
 As in grandeur I rose from its lord,
 But soon I beheld my fair garden yielding
 The choicest of fruit for his foe.
 But, where is my father's lone cottage of clay,
 Wherein I've spent many a long day,
 Alas ! has his lordship conniv'd it away ?
 Yes, it is gone, I shall never see it more.
 When nature was seen in the sloe bush and bramble,
 All smiling in beautiful bloom,
 Over the fields without danger, I often
 Did ramble amidst their perfume ;
 I have wrangled through the woods where the gay feather'd throng
 Joyfully sung their loud echoing song
 These days then of summer passed sweetly along,
 Now they're gone
 I shall ne'er see them more
 When the sloe and the berries hung ripe on the bushes
 I have gathered them off without harm
 I have gone to the field and shorn the green rushes,
 Preparing for winter's cold storm !
 Along with my friends telling tales of delight,
 Beguiling the hours of the long winter's night,
 Those days gave me pleasure
 I could them invite ;
 Now they're gone, I shall ne'er see them more.
 Oh, Erin ! oh, Erin ! it grieves me to ponder
 The wrongs of thy injurned isle !
 Of thy sons may a thousand from home do wander
 On shores far away an exile !
 But give me the power to cross the main,
 Calumbia might yield me some shelter from pain,

I am only lamenting whilst here I remain,
For the boys I shall ne'er see again.
